I have collected some data for three separate years for my project on the attendance of museums and galleries in England. Here is a brief description of the information.

First of all, I have compared five national museums and galleries in England in 2013, 2015 and 2017. Both Natural History Museum and Science Museum have lost 2.1 million and 2.5 million visitors each. These results may be drawn on the fact that these museums introduced admission charges in 2014. I have rated all of the places mentioned above, and the British Museum has the biggest increase of visitors (3 million) in 2013-2017.

Moreover, comparing results in 2013-2015 and in 2015-2017, you might notice that the amount of visitors has respectively decreased in general, which may appeal to the lack of interest in art and self-education.

After summarizing the data, I have some recommendations and ideas to share. Firstly, the museums with admission charges should create free-of-charge days. It will attract a lot of visitors, such as students and tourists. Secondly, all of the museums and galleries are recommended to make accounts on different social media platforms, because nowadays people spend most of their time looking at their smartphones.

To sum up, I would like to say that people's attendance of museums and galleries should be a matter of governmental and state concern as well as regular schools and libraries. The present report was made to share the situation at the moment.
