~~Addressed to the task~~
 A brief analysis of the popularity of the museums ^{in the UK} between 2013 and 2017.

Museums are an important part of cultural life of ~~the United Kingdom~~ ~~the country~~ ~~as a whole~~. The level of museums' popularity indicates the level of the society's development. It can be measured by the annual number of ~~the~~ visitors ~~on~~ ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~country~~ ~~as a whole~~.

In the UK, the ~~total~~ number of museum visitors, per year (in the ~~last~~ six top museums of Britain) had been growing at a substantial rate: from 13,7 mln visitors in 2013 to 14,2 mln in 2015 to 16,1 mln in 2017.

Furthermore, every single museum of the six has grown ^{its annual visitor numbers} from 2013 to 2017, ~~except~~ with an exception of the Natural History Museum and the Science Museum: they introduced admission fees in 2014 so their downfall ^{in visitor numbers} was ~~not~~ unexpected. Admission charges have their own pros and cons: free museums appeal to a wider audience while ~~paid~~ ones with paid entry are able to make a profit and enhance their collection. Admission fees can only be recommended to museums that are popular enough to stay relevant even if you have to pay ~~for~~ ~~it~~.

British Museum is the most popular in the UK, it also has the most wide-ranged collection. It is the most interesting to visit ~~with all its exhibits~~ ~~the~~ ~~Russian Hermitage~~. It can be said that the British Museum does everything right and should continue its course.

With all this said, it is no surprise that the British Museum has shown the biggest growth in 2013-2017 in the number of visitors - it has grown by 3 million ^{annual} visitors ~~per year~~.

Another interesting fact: ~~that it is~~ ~~more~~ ~~popular~~ scientific museums are much less popular ^{annual} than art galleries: 3.5 million and 7 million ^{visitors} ~~annually~~ ^{respectively}.

All in all I have to say that museums have become more popular between 2013 and 2017. It indicates a dynamic growth of society in the GB.
